Report writing

Planning to write a report:

Before writing a report, you should consider the following:

Establishing the purpose

- It is always written with the intention of achieving some objective.
- It can be based on practical work, a review of literature or an industrial or business situation that you have studied.
- You have to identify the objective or topic and what you have to report on. This forms the focus for how you gather the information.

Audience/Reader

- It is always written for a "client", who can be within the organisation, eg. your supervisor, or outside the organisation. It can even be a group of customers.
- It is therefore necessary to identify who will be reading the report and what they want from it (that is, the needs of the readers).
- This awareness of your audience determines how much background information needs to be given in the report.
- In your report you therefore need to bridge this gap between the readers' background knowledge and their needs.
- Awareness of the readers helps you determine the choice of vocabulary, the degree of detail, the tone of the report, and the emphasis.
- If you are trying to convey technical information to a non-technical reader, special attention to use of words and detail is necessary.

Investigating past knowledge

This may involve a literature review and interviews with key people. We recommend that you:

- Prepare your reading list, making sure you find out if you need to get information from sources other than books and articles.
- Collect your information.
- Consider interviewing or talking to people who are involved. (Avoid "hearsay") You can also check computer print-outs, collect brochures and pamphlets.

Obtaining new evidence

You may need to do some of the following:

- Carry out experiments.
- Collect data.
- Visit a site.
- Carry out calculations.
- Carry out a design.
- Conduct interviews.

Making conclusions and recommendations
